To whom it may concern

I am writing as the owner and operator of Jellicles Farm, a small acreage enterprise committed to both high-quality produce and innovative farming methods. Over the past decade, we have experienced firsthand the diverse challenges that come with small scale farming. We've had to adapt our growing methods, navigate market fluctuations, and balance labor input to attain the best possible outcome. It is with this perspective that I extend my full support for the micro-tractotruck initiative proposed by Ubiquity Robotics.

The prospect of integrating automation and robotics into our daily farming operations is both exciting and timely. From sowing to harvest, every phase of farming presents its unique challenges and demands. A machine like the micro-tractotruck could revolutionize these processes, making them more efficient, less labor-intensive, and ultimately more sustainable. This aligns perfectly with our vision for Jellicles Farm and Hundred-Acre-Hub, a cooperative farming enterprise leveraging technology to its fullest extent.

Moreover, I believe that the proposed micro-tractotruck aligns with my focus on environmental stewardship and maintaining good mental and physical health for farmers. By automating strenuous or repetitive tasks, we can not only prevent injuries but also free up time for farmers to engage in strategic planning, market development, and other intellectually engaging activities.

It is my firm belief that the future of farming lies in such innovative solutions. Adopting robotics and automation will not only help us maintain profitability in the face of rising labor costs but also contribute to the sustainability and resilience of our farming systems.

I am excited about the prospect of integrating the micro-tractotruck into our operations at Jellicles Farm. It is my hope that this letter serves as a testament to my support for this initiative and its potential to revolutionize farming.

Yours sincerely,

Lalitha Visveswaran Lalitha Visveswaran
